Warily optimistic

Key points

- Business confidence fell 8 points to +54 in January, while expected own activity eased 4 points to +46, still both very high. Past own activity (the best GDP indicator) was stable close to zero, while past employment continued to lift, though at -7 it remains in contraction.
- Pricing and cost indicators lifted, with the downward trends that have been in place over the past year showing signs of flattening off. Inflation expectations lifted a touch but remain within the target band at 2.7%.

Table 1: Results versus last month

Net Balance	Jan	Dec	Comment
Business Confidence	54.4	62.3	Easing, but still extremely high.
Own Activity Outlook	45.8	50.3	Retail, manuf and construction sectors the most upbeat (though were the hardest hit).
Export Intentions	15.9	16.8	Weaker NZD not having an impact.
Investment Intentions	14.6	21.5	Services and construction fell.
Employment Intentions	14.4	14.3	Decent lifts across retail, manufacturing and construction, the latter the most positive.
Residential Construction	46.2	44.1	Highest since Feb-21.
Commercial Construction	38.1	34.2	Highest read since Jun-21.
Profit Expectations	22.7	31.1	Retail most positive, while other sectors slipped.
Ease of Credit	15.2	19.3	Construction still highest, despite a pullback.
Activity vs. 1 year ago	0.2	0.0	Just construction in the red, though rising.
Employment vs. 1 yr ago	-7.1	-13.3	Manufacturing now in positive territory.
Cost Expectations 3m	73.6	70.1	Broad-based increase, outside of services – related to the weaker NZD perhaps?
Wage Expectations 12m	83.1	79.2	Second consecutive monthly increase.
Pricing Intentions 3m	45.7	42.7	Has risen in 6 of 7 months since Jun-24.
Inflation Expectations 1y	2.67%	2.63%	In the target band, albeit the upper end.

It was a slightly less encouraging start to the New Year for businesses with perhaps reality biting as it becomes clear that falling interest rates over the second half of last year will take time to work their magic. That's not surprising, and the level of confidence and activity expectations remains very healthy, despite the pullback to start the year.

Economy-wide reported past activity (the best indicator of GDP) lifted marginally in January, following December's large bounce. Smoothing through the month-to-month volatility continues to suggest the economy has lifted off the floor, though it certainly isn't flooring it just yet. About as many firms are still reporting lower activity as are saying it's higher, compared to year-ago levels (figure 2).

Positively, reported past employment rose further in January, though it is still in contractionary territory. While the correction in employment levels may still have a little further to run, given the typical lagged response to past weakness in activity, responses suggest that the pace of contraction is becoming more gradual.

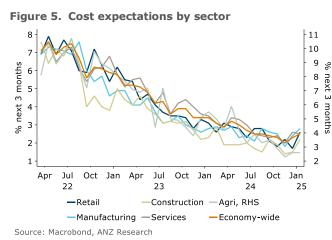

Less positively, it's becoming harder to write off the rises in pricing and cost indicators seen over recent months as simply volatility. The downtrends that have been in place since mid-2022 now look to be petering out, still above levels historically consistent with headline inflation at target. However, inflation expectations remain more well behaved. Despite a mild tick-up in January, they remain within the 1-3% target band at 2.7%, though the RBNZ would no doubt prefer to see them closer to the 2% target midpoint.

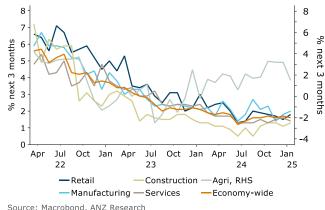

The above charts are the net percent of firms saying costs and prices will be higher or lower. When we look at firms' numerical estimates of changes in their own costs and prices over the next three months, the downtrends also appear to have stabilised, though the limited history for these questions means one can't infer what that implies for the level of CPI inflation. Nonetheless they have fallen a long way from where they were in 2022. Firms on average expect costs to rise 2.5% over the next three months, though they expect to raise prices by only 1.6% over the same period, a reflection of weak consumer demand restricting their pricing power.

Our take

A modest pullback across headline confidence and some activity indicators in January's Business Outlook Survey certainly doesn't suggest the recovery in the economic activity has stalled, though firms may be reassessing how long they might have to wait to get back to a new "normal". Insofar as the slowdown was primarily caused by higher interest rates, lower interest rates should be an effective cure, but it will take time.

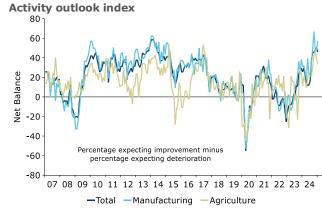

Meanwhile, another month of increases across pricing intentions and cost expectations highlights some lingering inflation challenges under the surface. The softer NZD may well be a factor here. Inflation driven by exchange rate movements doesn't tend to be persistent, but that doesn't mean it's irrelevant – particularly given much of the decline in headline inflation in recent years has come through the tradable channel, whereas non-tradable inflation has had some sticky elements despite clear weakness in the economy. Reassuringly, the Q4 CPI report released earlier this month showed underlying domestic disinflation is intact, and in fact is easing a little faster than the RBNZ had anticipated in November's MPS.

Nonetheless, firms continue to report an environment of high costs. While demand is recovering, the potential for supply-side constraints to still be lurking is one of the reasons the RBNZ is likely to become more cautious in reducing the OCR as it gets closer to a neutral policy setting. While this survey certainly doesn't stand in the way of the RBNZ delivering another 50bp cut in February, it does highlight some of the uncertainties on the horizon further into 2025 regarding just how much growth the economy might be able to deliver before inflation pressures re-emerge. For now, however, still subdued demand conditions appear to be stifling firms' intentions to raise prices.
