Bottom line

- Annual CPI inflation was stable in Q4 at 2.2% (+0.5% q/q), in line with our expectation but a touch stronger than the RBNZ's November MPS forecast of 2.1%.
- However, annual non-tradable inflation (largely domestic driven) slowed 0.4% pts to 4.5% y/y, weaker than our and the RBNZ's expectation of 4.7%.
- Core measures of inflation eased further, with major measures within the 1-3% target band.
- Tradable inflation (largely imported) came in at -1.1% y/y, a touch higher than our expectation (-1.2%) and the RBNZ's forecast of -1.5%.
- The RBNZ won't welcome slightly higher than forecast headline inflation, but a small downside miss on non-tradable inflation should trump the small upside miss on the tradable side, meaning a 50bp cut in February remains appropriate.

Big picture and monetary policy implications

Headline inflation was stable at 2.2% in Q4 as higher tradable inflation (the more volatile side of the CPI basket) collided with lower non-tradable inflation.

Compared to the RBNZ's November MPS forecast, headline inflation came in a little hotter than expected, as higher-than-expected tradable inflation more than offset weaker non-tradable inflation. While the RBNZ certainly won't welcome the higher headline, underlying disinflation remains very much intact. Annual non-tradable inflation remains on a downwards, and slightly steeper than forecast, trajectory, and core measures were encouraging too: the ex food, fuel and energy measure slowed 0.1% point to 3.0% y/y, the weighted median fell 0.2% points to 2.6%, and the 30% trimmed mean measure fell 0.2% points to 2.5%. Completing the suite of core measures, the RBNZ's sectoral factor model will be released at 3pm.

Stepping back, provided inflation expectations remain anchored near the target midpoint, we think the trajectory for underlying inflation means there's scope for the RBNZ to look through slightly higher near-term tradable inflation than forecast (recent NZD weakness and higher oil prices add upside risks to the outlook for tradable inflation in coming quarters). We certainly don't think today's data will prevent another 50bp cut in February. If anything, today's release should add to the RBNZ's confidence that tight monetary conditions have worked to tame underlying inflation, meaning it's entirely appropriate to return monetary conditions to a more neutral setting. Beyond February, however, we think upside inflation risks and the risk that the neutral OCR is creeping higher will warrant a more cautious approach to the withdrawal of monetary restriction.

The details

Breaking down the details of the 0.5% q/q rise in CPI in the December 2024 quarter:

- The transport group (typically one of the more volatile components of the CPI and 13.5% of the CPI) rose 1.5% q/q, making a 0.2% point contribution to headline inflation. This was a little stronger than expected. Within this group, a 1.3% q/q fall in petrol prices was more than offset by seasonally higher prices for air travel (domestic up 9.3% q/q, international up 6.6% q/q).
- The recreation and culture group (6.9% of the CPI) rose 2.1% q/q (0.2% point contribution), stronger than expected, driven by a 2.4% q/q rise in overseas accommodation, a 6.5% q/q rise in domestic accommodation and a 8.5% q/q rise in games, toys and hobbies equipment.
- The housing group (27.8% of the CPI basket) rose 0.5 q/q, making a 0.1% point contribution to quarterly inflation. Rents were up 0.8% q/q (as expected) and housing construction costs rose 0.3% q/q. That was a little weaker than the 0.5% q/q we had pencilled in and well below the historical average of around 1.2% q/q the downturn in this very cyclical part of the economy is clearly translating into prices.
- Miscellaneous goods and services (7.3% of the basket) rose 1.0% q/q, in line with forecast. Strength here continues to reflect rising insurance costs.
- The largest drag in the quarter came from the food group (18.8% of the CPI basket), which fell 0.5% q/q as signalled by the Food Price Index and driven be seasonal weakness in fruit and vegetables (down 5.1% q/q)
- Other parts of the CPI were broadly as expected in that they didn't make strong contributions to quarterly inflation.

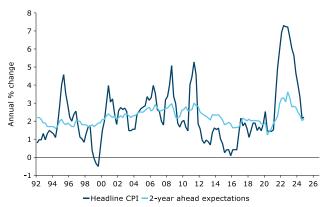

All in all, looking through the usual surprises in some of the details, the main drivers of inflation in Q4 were largely as forecast. Most importantly, 2024 concluded with the underlying disinflation trajectory intact and indicators of spare capacity suggesting that there's more to come over 2025 (even if tradable inflation picks up for a time). We'll publish our updated forecasts in this week's Data Wrap (out Friday).
